III. Lecture Description

- a. Brief Description of Lecture:

This talk presents women's rage as a counter-response to sexual humiliation resulting from both men's gender-based sexual violence against women and the conditions for the possibility of that violence. The lecture illustrates that within the contemporary U.S., victims/survivors are inhibited from speaking, especially publicly, about their experiences of rape and sexual assault. This silencing is an effect of those experiences themselves as well as broader social ambivalence toward sexual violence against women. The talk proceeds to posit rage, by both victims/survivors themselves and within the context of feminist anti-sexual violence protest more broadly, as a form of embodied expression that disrupts the seamless reproduction of conditions for the possibility of sexual violence and humiliation and that violence itself; by extension, expressions of rage by women undermine victims'/survivors' silencing. The hearings that ultimately resulted in Brett Kavanaugh's appointment to the U.S. Supreme Court and the events surrounding them (i.e. Christine Blasey Ford's accusation of sexual assault against Kavanaugh and testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, protests against Kavanaugh's appointment and in support of Ford) frame the talk and are drawn upon to illustrate its key assertions.
